Classic car theft is increasing

With rising classic car values, thefts of classics are increasing. They are stolen by determined criminals, in some cases to be broken for spares. What a fate for a cherished classic car!

The vital thing for a classic car owner is to be alerted of any interference with the car and, if it is stolen, to have information as to where the car is to enable recovery to be achieved. The likelihood of a police response and active work to recover the car will be far, far greater with live information on where the car has gone. That's why a tracker is an essential device.

The standard tracker provides continuous monitoring of the car for disturbance and its location but in addition the specialist tracker suppliers, like Automatrix and Classic Tracker, also offer their professional active monitoring service. So if your car were to be stolen that service can promptly trace your car for you and coordinate with the police to achieve a successful recovery.

Naturally that professional service costs an annual fee so a classic car owner will need to judge whether that service on top of the purchase price of the tracker is worth the additional cost.
